with Monsieur and the Count d'Artois. The recall of Necker was insisted upon, and the King has sent for him. It is said the reason of his thus acquiescing in everything that is asked him is that he makes a point of acting quite contrary to Charles I. in his dissensions with his people, and he is constantly studying his history. He has ordered the Count d'Artois and his family to leave France, as well as the other Princes of the blood; but Monsieur has refused to go. The Polignacs also, who are the objects of the detestation of the populace, are ordered away for their safety, and Madame de Tourzel is to be surintendante des enfans. There were only three prisoners found in the Bastille.

M. de la Fayette is made commandant-général de la Milice Parisienne. The people of Paris insist on the King's coming amongst them.

July 21th.

The King has been to Paris. M. de Beau-veau went with him. The people would not let the Gardes du Corps go beyond the barrieres, M. Bailly[1] presented the keys of the city to i Bailly, mayor of Paris, who was subsequently quillotined. It was he who made the famous answer to one
